Who to Blame for Student Brawls

Sadly, cases of students getting involved in brawls have been reported nationwide and recently reports of these brawls have increased in number, causing even more casualties. News about a student in Jakarta who died and two others who were injured in a clash between two neighboring high school is not something new. This is just one example of what has been happening to teens all over Indonesia and how violent these brawls have become. Whose fault is this?

It is the parents' role to teach students morals and norms, while the school directs them to the acceptable norms and behaviors, besides educating them both socially and academically. Parents need to remind students that every action comes with its consequences, either good or bad. There is an argument that students cannot differentiate right or wrong without parents' and school's assistance.

Moreover, the society also has a strong influence on students. Their circle of friends highly influences them. If they belong to a violent circle, they will grow up into violent people. Peer pressure often forces these students into brawls.

In conclusion, adults should set a good example and make sure that students are on the right track. This will not only save them from themselves, but will also result in a brighter tomorrow.
