Dear Lan,

I know it has been a long time since I last wrote. Life in the city moves so fast that some days I forget to stop and think. But last weekend, I went to the market near my apartment, and I saw an old woman selling dried herbs from a small basket. The smell reminded me so much of our grandmother's kitchen that I had to stand there for a moment and just breathe. It is funny how a simple smell can bring everything back.

Living in Ho Chi Minh City is exciting, but it is also a little lonely sometimes. Everything here is new and big and loud. People walk fast, eat fast, and talk fast. I have made some good friends at university, but the way we spend time together feels different from home. We meet in coffee shops and shopping centres, not in each other's houses. We chat more on our phones than face to face. I do not think it is bad, exactly. It is just unfamiliar, like wearing shoes that almost fit.

I think about our village more than I expected. The slow mornings. The sound of the river. The way everyone knew your name. I used to find that suffocating sometimes, if I am honest. I wanted space and freedom and something bigger. Now I am here, and I have all of that, and I also understand what I left behind. Maybe that is just what growing up feels like. Write back when you can.

With love, Minh
