The Long Journey to the Capital

Last month, Lucas decided to take a challenging trip from his small, isolated village in the north of Norway to the capital city, Oslo. He wanted to visit a famous historical museum and meet his old school friends. He did not want to travel by car because his vehicle was too old and unreliable. Instead, he decided to travel by public transport.

His journey began very early on Monday morning. First, he got up at five o'clock and walked to the local bus station. The weather was freezing, and he felt quite nervous about the long distance. Next, he took a local bus to the nearest train station. On the bus, he spoke to an elderly man who also lived in his village. They talked about local football teams and how much they loved the sport.

Then, Lucas arrived at the train station, but he ran into trouble. He realized that he forgot his main wallet at home. Luckily, he had some extra cash and his credit card in his jacket pocket, so he bought a train ticket without any major problems. The train ride took seven hours. During the journey, he did not sleep; instead, he relaxed, read a book, and watched the beautiful landscapes outside the window.

After that, the train finally arrived at Oslo Central Station at four o'clock in the afternoon. Lucas went out of the station and used his map to find his destination. He turned left onto a busy avenue, walked past a large park, and finally arrived at his hotel. He met his friends at a restaurant later that evening. They ate traditional Norwegian food and had an excellent time together discussing their childhood memories.
