

Last semester, I joined a volunteer activity at a local elementary school.

My friends and I helped the teachers organize a reading program for the students.

We prepared short storybooks, colorful flashcards, and simple reading exercises.

At the beginning of the activity, some students were shy and did not want to read aloud.

We encouraged them by reading the stories together and giving them positive feedback.

After a few activities, the students became more confident and active.

They also enjoyed answering questions and sharing their opinions about the stories.

At the end of the program, the teacher thanked us for helping the students improve their reading skills.

This experience taught me how to communicate with children, work patiently, and create an enjoyable learning environment.
