THE SUMATRAN STRIPED RABBIT

The Sumatran striped rabbit is a rare rabbit from Sumatra, Indonesia. Its scientific name is Nesolagus netscheri. It lives in the montane forests of the Barisan Mountains in northwestern Sumatra. This rabbit is different from common rabbits because it has a special striped body.

The Sumatran striped rabbit has a yellowish-grey body with dark brown or black stripes. Its fur is soft and dense. It has short black ears, a broad head, and a short muzzle. Its underparts, including its chin and the inside of its legs, are white. Its legs are grey-brown, while its short tail is reddish. An adult rabbit is about 37–39 centimeters long and weighs around 1.5 kilograms.

The Sumatran striped rabbit is a solitary and nocturnal animal. It is usually active at night and spends the day resting. It lives among dense plants in the forest and often rests in animal burrows or tree hollows. It eats plants, especially the leaves and stalks of understory plants. It also eats fallen fruits. The rabbit is rarely seen, so scientists still know little about its life in the wild.
