Beijing Olympics

In 2008 China hosted the Beijing Olympics. Thousands of top athletes and millions of fans poured into Beijing to participate in the Games that started in August. (32) _____

Some of the new buildings are like no others in the world. The National Stadium, for example, is called the 'Bird's Nest'. (33) _____

At one point, as many as 7,000 workers were building the huge stadium! It has 91,000 seats for fans who want to watch competitions in sports including archery, BMX biking and wrestling.

The National Aquatics Centre was nicknamed the 'Water Cube'. (34) _____ The special covering helped keep the temperature and humidity inside the structure just right.

Swimmers, divers and water polo teams all competed here. And when the summer games were over, the building didn't stand empty.

(35) _____ The Olympic Village, where more than 15,000 athletes and coaches stayed during the games, has a dining hall that can serve 5,000 people. (36) _____

The Chinese had thought of everything to make their Olympic guests more comfortable - including the weather. They had even planned to use special techniques to keep rain clouds from spoiling the Opening Ceremony.

The Chinese had worked hard to try to make sure the Olympics weren't bad for the environment. In the Olympic Village, solar panels provided some of the electricity to keep the lights on. Rain was collected to help provide water for drinking and bathing. (37) _____

Playing For Water

For kids in many rural parts of Africa, the colourful PlayPump is the first playground equipment they've ever seen. When they give a push and jump onboard for their first ride, smiles of surprise appear on their faces. Even children as young as age three are amazed by the colourful piece of equipment and often adults play on it too! The fun of moving round in a circle is just part of the amazement. This incredible invention doesn't just change their playtime, it changes their lives. As the merry-go-round spins, it pumps clean water up from deep underground and stores it in a huge tank. People are welcome to come and help themselves to the water.

In rural Africa, clean water is a luxury. Most people don't have access to water in their homes. Instead, they often must walk long distances to wells and carry heavy containers of water back. Patricia Molope, 17, explains that before her South African village got a PlayPump, people would pay a taxi driver to take them to a well far away. 'Sometimes the taxi drivers were busy, and we would have to go without bathing in order to save our water. It was too far to walk there. But now we have our own clean water in our village, and life is better.'

The extremely tiring job of carrying water is traditionally done by women and girls. Carrying water for miles each day (sometimes this takes as much as 6 hours) is such a big job, it sometimes prevents girls from being able to attend school. Thanks to the PlayPump, getting water is quick and easy - and even boys join in. The pumps have become a centre of social activity where kids and adults gather to visit while collecting water. Some towns have even organised parties for children around the PlayPump. There is singing and dancing while the children play, and at the same time water is being stored for all members of the community.

Two sides of each tank carry educational messages that remind people about good health practices like preventing illness germs through hand-washing. The other two sides carry advertisements, which help pay to keep the water pump working. So far, more than 800 PlayPumps are operating in schools and communities in four African countries, providing water for almost two million people. The pumps are made by a South African company called Outdoor Fabrication and Steelworks. Another company, Roundabout Outdoor, trains local teams who look after the pumps. Each system costs U.S. $14,000.

Twelve-year-old Siyabulisiwe Khumalo lives in a South African community called Diepsloot. She says, 'I have seen many kinds of water pumps where I grew up in the farmlands, but never one that stores the water. When I grow up, I want to be an inventor so I can invent clever things like the PlayPump that will help my community.'

What kind of water does the pump give rural Africans?

(45) _____

Where is the water stored?

(46) _____

What do most rural Africans not have in their homes?

(47) _____

When they couldn't get clean water, what would people in Patricia Molope's village do to save water?

(48) _____

Who usually gets water in villages?

(49) _____

How many hours a day might a woman in a village without a PlayPump spend getting water?

(50) _____

What can some girls not do because they have to be getting water instead?

(51) _____

What do the two sides of the tank that don't have educational messages on them have?

(52) _____
