

Helping the Explorers; The Metis

Explorers came to Canada from England and France in the 1500's. They met indigenous people who had been living in Canada for thousands of years.

The indigenous people helped the explorers to live in Canada.

They helped them to understand the land and waters of Canada. They helped them to make canoes from trees. They showed them maps of the land and waters on birch bark.

Canada has many lakes and rivers. They helped them to find their way on the lakes and rivers.

Indigenous people helped the explorers to find food. They were excellent hunters, trappers, and fishers. They taught the explorers how to hunt, trap, and fish so they could survive.

Indigenous people knew about the animals of Canada.

The biggest animal hunt on the prairies was for buffalo. One buffalo gave lots of meat (about 700 kg). Buffalo is also called bison.

The buffalo was dried and stored for a long time. Today, it would be called "jerky".

Women prepared pemmican – dried meat pounded into a powder. The powder was mixed with buffalo fat and berries when it was needed. A hunter carried pemmican in a small bag when he was away from camp.

Explorers learned about pemmican from indigenous peoples; it was a nutritious food for them to eat also.

Indigenous people also knew about the plants of Canada. They gathered plants from the land to use as food and as medicine.

Some of the explorers married Indigenous women. This was a good partnership for explorers. A wife could speak the indigenous language and talk with other people for her husband. Their children were called Metis.

The word Metis is a French word meaning "mixed". A Metis person has a mix of bloodlines – part indigenous, and part European (usually French). The Metis chose the infinity symbol for their culture.
