WHEN THE MUSIC IS OVER...

Music festivals are the hottest holiday destination for young people in Europe. The continent offers some of the biggest outdoor rock events in the world and cheaper intercontinental flights have allowed growing numbers of young people to combine a trip abroad with their chance to see their favorite band. But what happens when all the fun, music and dance is over?

This recent fashion for festivals mini-breaks has an environmental cost. Fans often leave mountains of multicolored waste behind once the festival has finished. In 2010, for example, the Glastonbury organizers reported that they had collected 20,000 kilos of clothing, tents and sleeping bags!

Many bands and singers also noticed that something was not right. Radiohead said in a press conference that they would not play at festivals that did not offer eco-friendly policies. The Killers also said that they were concerned about environmental issues and promised to think of ways to clean up after their shows. At the same time, they asked their fans to help.

But what are the big event organizers doing? The town of Benicassim in Spain, for example, mainly uses biodegradable or recyclable materials in bars and restaurants. In Denmark, the Roskilde festival manager told the press that he had introduced a refundable deposit on drink containers, and 97% were returned. The Big Green Gathering organizers told the festivals-goers to arrive by public transport, walk or bike.

But is this enough? No, of course it isn't. A lot more could be done. And the idea of combining music with a relaxing break will only be sustainable when everyone takes responsibility.
