Bill Moyes - the father of hang-gliding

Hang-gliding is an outdoor sport in which a pilot flies a light aircraft, without a motor. Australian Bill Moyes was thirty-four when he took up hang-gliding and that's quite an old age for an extreme sport.

When he was fourteen, Bill would wake him up at four o'clock to go hang-gliding before school and later Steve became a world champion.

Its title is The Birdmen of Kilimanjaro and it shows the father and son climbing up to the top and flying off in hang gliders.

Flying was Bill Moyes's whole life. In 1967, he set the first world record at 350 metres above the ground.

In 1970, he started using airplanes to pull his hang-glider through the sky. In 1971, he flew at 2,866 metres!

Bill had never expected that it would become a sport. Soon his friends started asking him to build them a hang glider so he set up a company and sold his first hang glider in 1967.

Bill always tried out his new productions himself.
